After the best first quarter in a decade, global equity markets didn't miss a beat and got off to a strong Q2 start. Stronger-than-expected readings on purchasing manager indices in China and the United Kingdom kicked off the week on a positive note. In the US, the employment picture remained positive. Employers added a further 196,000 jobs in March – this was welcome news after the largely disappointing gain in February. While the most recent picture was slightly stronger than expected, it still suggests that the overall trend in hiring is moderating from the robust pace of job growth we saw last year. But by just about any measure, the labour market remains exceptionally tight
